

Example 1

Origin:

This primary source was created by Jacob Clifford and Adriene Hill two experts who work in the field of Economics. The video was created in 2015 and published on YouTube as educational content for the popular channel Crash Course. Jacob Clifford one of the writers and co-hosts is an entrepreneur and teacher who has a degree from the University of Delaware for economics. Adriene Hill has a bachelor's degree in political science and economics from Amherst College and a master's degree for political science from Northwestern University.

Purpose:

The purpose of this video would be to provide educational content for the YouTube community while doing this earning revenue through ads for the company crash course and for co-hosts (Hill and Clifford). The content would also be created to help college, university and high school students learn economics. The authors of this video have no specific perspective rather present both sides

Value:

This source was very useful to me it gave me a basic understanding of how _____ is affecting people around the world and it also provided me with factors and effects I previously think about. The information in this source has been reviewed by some sources and the facts stated corroborate through my reading of other texts of the same information like other _____ and many reputable sources like the world bank.

Limitations:

The source is very reliable and doesn't seem bias towards anyone, group or class. The source is limited by the fact that it doesn't provide a lot of specific examples of how globalization affects certain people rather explains the concepts and theories of globalization in a general way.